THE MILITARY CHARACTER OF AARON BURR

knowledged to have been of a high order. The natural acuteness of his mind was highly favorable to success in all subjects pertaining to Belles-lettres. With a most retentive memory, and an imagination easily excited, he spent several months after leaving the College Halls of Princeton in reading the history of the most renowned military characters; and to his plastic mind, "the military hero" became the "beau ideal" of his soule-an allpervading principle. Under the influence of this tutelary genius, the first gun fired at Lexington, 1775, electrified his ardent mind with the eager anticipation of gaining laurels on the field of Wars. It had been his purpose to enter at once on the study of the Law, but his youthful soul was filled with images too highly colored to allow for a moment the thought of applying to the drudgery of prefessional life. He applied to his guardian for permission to join the Continental Army. His slender frame, delicate to a fault, the indulgence with which he had ever been treated, and the effeminating influence of a student's life, all urged upon his guardian the propriety of a denial. In his own mind he had already passed "the Rubicon," and expostulation was useless. He hastened to Charlestown, a bey of twenty, and presented himself as a volunteer-not in the cause of his country so much as in the field, where glorious distinction might begained. He soon found that the American troops, disorderly, and undisciplined as they were at

Again, kind friends interposed, representing the certain destruction that awaited a mere stripling, in a wild march of more than thirty days, at a period of the year when the severity of a northern winter might naturally be anticipated. But his abstemiousness in the vulgar indulgence of eating and drinking, practised in college to enable him to accomplish his ambitious purposes, carried him triumphantly through an enterprise betore which Napoleon's celebrated passage of the Alps dwindles into insignificance. In this protracted march young Burr exhibited the quality of endurance beyond what his friends deemed possible. No less worthy of admiration was the sagacity which he displayed in pioneering the way from the head-waters of the Kennebec to the neighborhood of Quebec, to ir form General Montgomery of the approaching expedition. The whole region from Jersey City to Sufferns, and from New York to Peekskill, witnessed his activity in ferreting out and thwarting the plans of the enemy. In contemplating this portion of Burr's history, one would readily affirm that he exhibited elements of character that only needed a theatre for their devel-ment to produce a military hero of the highest order. At the battle of Monmouth his bravery and good judgment were worthy of notice, but, unfortunately, he was in the wake of General Lee, whose unsoldierly conduct on that occasion brought upon himself the indignation of the Commander-in-Chief. Yet even here untiring vigilance, and an eye that saw every weak point, as well as the moment favorable for action, proved Cel. Burr to be one of the best officers in the American Army. To Burr the sentence pronounced upon Gen. Lee was very galling, for it carried with it an implied censure of his own conduct. This, however, was unmerited. His usual energy and bravery in that protracted engagement, with a temperature of one hundred degrees to support, was undoubted. Even Washington tacitly acknowledged it, for he soon after confided Burr a hazardous yet important mission to Elizabethtown, to ascertain, if possible, the movement of Sir George

The soldiers under his command loved him with a devotion rarely surpassed, and he exerted his power for their benefit. What others deemed difficult and hazardous was to him a pastime, and no enterprise within the read of human skill was beyond his aspirations. If he had appeared on the stage in the days of Cortez or Pizarro, he would have risen superior to either. If Mexico, in the revolution that set her free from Spain, had been the theatre of his action, he would have overtowared Iturbide; or if he had been in the army of Napoleon, he would have been eurolled among his bravest and most successful marshals. But the nature of the conflict in which he embarked, and the character of the officers with whom he came in competition, precluded the idea of his reaching that eminence which
